The article is written to give reader tips on how to get hired during the coronavirus pandemic. It is aimed towards final-year students that will be graduating soon.

The article starts by highlighting on few sectors of industries that should be focused on applying. Besides, the author also insists on the importance of developing skills during lockdown to help build your CV to show for potential employers. In addition, the author explained that among the many places to look for jobs are LinkedIn or looking for businesses in Google Street View. The author also mentioned to apply as early as possible, and that nearly all interviews, assessments and selection tests are now conducted fully online. Thus, student can practice by having mock online interviews to get them comfortable.

In my opinion, the article was written in an incoherent way and many of the tips given did not have a strong reasoning behind it. Some parts of the article are poorly written without proper context. It is difficult to follow some of the author's suggestions because of the lack of further explanation, scarce examples, or unclear reasoning. I have not learned much from this article as most of tips given can simply be gathered from common sense such as applying for position as early as possible.

In conclusion, there are a lot of areas in the article that severely need an improvement and be given proper explanation. I would not recommend this article for students seeking advice on getting hired as there are more comprehensive articles can be found elsewhere.
